

Save a fox, Hunt a.....chav?

Ever since the ban on fox hunting people have looked for ingenious ways to keep hunting. Some moved to drag hunting, some used dogs to flush and then shoot the foxes, some even used eagles to track the fox. Here at horseplay we feel its not the style of hunting that needs changing but the quarry!

Having studying the legislation in great detail we feel there are certain loopholes that may allow us to hunt certain mammals as they do not necessarily fit into any of the categories included in the act. During this series of articles we will cover certain animals which may well be fair game.

The Chav, Homo Sapiens Chaviens, is an increasing common pest species seen throughout the United Kingdom. It is believed to have come about due to the importation of various American species, such as 'rappers' and 'hip hop gangsters'. Its has a number of looks but they are all unique and easily identifiable. Some have a burberry check plumage whereas other favour full tracksuits, usually Nike or Addidas.

Brand names are very important to a chav and the ones that sport the most are the dominant animals in the group. The males often wear Mackenzie or Fred Perry. The females favour sport brands during the day but at night they dress more "conventionally" in an attempt to attract mates (and to gain access to clubs).

Other defining features of chavs are their white trainers and excessive jewellery, known as 'bling'. Both males and females wear jewellery; the females large hoop earrings and rings and the males ear studs, heavy chain necklaces and sovereign rings. Usually the jewellery is gold (well, in colour at least) though silver is acceptable amongst less hardcore chavs.

The final ways to recognise a chav is by their hairstyles. The females are usually dyed blonde and have their hair pulled back tight in a so called 'Croydon facelift' during the day. At night they will let their hair down and style it like various celebrities by using ghd's.

The males tend to have short hair (often shaved) and tend to cover it with a baseball cap (often burberry in colour)

The chav causes various problems, such as littering, anti social behaviour, noise pollution from their suped up cars and dreadful abuse of the English language. As the number of chavs seems to be increasingly rapidly, mainly due to the fact they

A 'loiter' of chavs grows nervous as the hounds approach reproduce incredibly fast (it is thought their gestation period is a mere 5 months and they are fully sexually mature at 10) a control program is necessary.

So get hunting!

Female chavs get ready for a wild night on the town, they will probably all be pregnant by midnight

How to hunt a chav:

Train the hounds to track the smell of Burberry and 'bling'.

Get used hunting in the urban jungle, chavs rarely stray into the countryside. It may be best to exchange the red coats for grey in order to blend in.

Chavs hang out in large groups, find one and you'll find a whole pack. Large numbers of hounds will be needed to ensure few escape and that the end is quick and painless as possible (we wouldn't want them to suffer!)
